HISTORY

The iconic red telephone box is symbolic the world over as a quirky and original emblem of British engineering, inventiveness and quirkiness. It is known that Gilbert Scott took the domed roof profile from Sir John Soane - a revered architect from over a century previous. Soane's Bank of England was being tragically demolished when Gilbert Scott designed the K6 - to commemorate the accession of George V. This particular example is in "Street" condition - i.e with scratched perspex panels (many now replaced with glass). This box has also received damage at a high level of the rear panel - the upper arched section is stoved in - a crack down the back has been welded (see photos).
